Question 1

Read the passage below and answer question a) and b)

Ganyau Republic had challenges with its procurement system. 80% of its procurement resulted in higher costs to the government and the public. Project implementation was always slow which further increased costs, lead to poor project execution performance and delays, and the delivery of benefits to the beneficiaries. The Republic's procurement problems also increased scope for corruption, generated more complaints and raised concerns about the integrity of the procurement process. Finally, poor procurement discourages good firms (both national and foreign) from participating in bidding, thus deprive the country of receiving better prices and goods, works and services (World Bank, 2003). According to Weele (2000), purchasing procedures are usually embedded in lots of bureaucracy and require that every superior puts his signature under the intended order. The extensive authorization procedures make procurement a tedious, laborious and slow process. It is also clear that Weele's view is not far different from the World Bank's assertion that delays as a result of bureaucratic system increase government expenditure.
