1. Giving examples, explain why it is important to employ a gender perspective in development.
2. Evaluate the assertion that participation in development is a panacea for the failures of the liberal theories of development.
3. Globalisation is important not because it creates gendered patterns/norms of consumption but because it changes how these patterns and norms are formed.

Today, however, many critics charge that dependency theory is out of date and fails to effectively explain contemporary economic and social conditions in the developing world. Do you agree or disagree with this critique?

6. Provide an analysis of how religion and political social structures in Africa are influencing individual behaviour with reference to Giddens' structuration perspective.
